The book "Boot Language: A Memoir" by Vanya Erickson left me feeling sad. In the story Erickson tells about her childhood. She grew up with an alcoholic father who seemed to hate her and a mother who refused to seek medical help for her children due to her religion. It was not an easy life but somehow Erickson got through it. "Boot Language" is the type of book that makes you look at your own ...

Narrator Nicol Zanzarella portrays Vanya Erickson as resilient and forgiving in her memoir about her erratic upbringing by a father suffering from PTSD after WWII and a Christian Scientist mother. Zanzarella plunges herself into Erickson's life and surroundings to sincerely describe the strong feelings of isolation that would leave the author feeling paralyzed with fear. Zanzarella has a ...

Our first book is called Boot Language by Vanya Erickson. When I read the back cover and found out that Vanya was raised with a mother who was a Christian Scientist, I knew this would be interesting. By a strange coincidence, my very good friend was also raised as a Christian Scientist and I have had quite a few conversations with her about growing up in her faith, what they believe in, etc ...

Vanya Erickson is the award-winning author of Boot Language, a memoir about growing up on a ranch during the Vietnam era. Long ago, she used to photograph and haul horses for a living. But for the last 25 years, she has been mentoring teachers while teaching writing and public speaking in the oldest, continuously used schoolhouse in California. She's passionate about hiking the High Sierras ...

In order to survive her childhood, Vanya Erickson was forced to become fluent in two languages: her Christian Scientist mother's honeyed versions of the truth; and her rancher father's hard-as-the-scrape-of-his-boothheels words, which stung like the back of his hand. Long version: From the outside, Vanya's childhood of riding horses with her father in the solitude of the Sierra Nevada ...
